Agricultural Cooperatives in Texas, 1952

Warren LeBourveau and W. E. Paulson*

THIS DIRECTORY of Texas agricultural cooperatives, as of November 15, 1952, is published as part of an economic and organizational analysis of these farmer-ranchmen business organizations.

Cooperatives play an important role in the economic aspects of Texas agriculture. Data being analyzed by the Texas Agricultural Experiment Station, but as yet unpublished, show that in 1950 these farmer-ranchmen organizations did business for 551,561 patrons—496,352 were members and 55,209 were non-members. According to the 1950 census, there were 323,169 farm operators in Texas. Thus on an average every farmer and ranchman in the State patronized 1.7 cooperatives — actually, in many cases farmers patronized more than the average, in other instances less, and in some cases none at all. Agricultural cooperatives are located in 205 of the State's 254 counties, as shown in the cover map. The 49 counties which do not have headquarters of a cooperative within their boundaries are, in almost every case, served by one or more cooperatives located in adjoining counties.

Numbers of Cooperatives

Texas had 940 agricultural cooperatives of all types as of November 15, 1952. By breakdown, these associations were composed of: 563 local marketing, processing and supply; 13 large-scale and centralized; 19 federated; 141 national farm loan; 36 production credit; 77 local rural electric; 8 rural telephone; 33 mutual insurance; 26 artificial breeding; and 24 dairy herd improvement cooperatives.

The total of 940 cooperatives is a net decrease of 2 percent in number since mid-1950. Records obtained indicate that during the 2-year period 49 cooperatives were chartered which are now operating, and that 68 cooperatives went out of business. Table 1 shows the totals, by major groups, for the 2 years, and the net changes within the groups.

This directory lists 18 associations which are inactive but alive. Four of these are citrus marketing cooperatives which are affected by the lack of fruit available from members. Three cooperatives are cotton gins located in drouth areas. Cotton production was reduced to such a point that the gin management decided to let the plants stand idle rather than open in the face of almost inevitable operating losses. These 7 inactive associations are mentioned specifically because they likely will re-open during the next favorable season. The remaining 11 inactive cooperatives represent various other types of activities, but they are all small and not too well organized, and they all fall into categories which rarely ever become active once they have gone dormant. All the "inactive but alive" cooperatives are designated in the directory.

Functions of Cooperatives

Texas agricultural cooperatives render many services to farmers and ranchmen, as shown in Table 2. The first group considered is the local marketing, processing and supply cooperatives.

Table 1. Number and distribution of Texas agricultural cooperatives by major groups, 1952 and 1950

Cooperative groups	Number of associations		Percent of total
	1950	1952	1950	1952

Production credit	36	36	3.8	3.8
Rural electric (local)	76	77	7.9	8.2

Dairy herd improvement	34	24	3.5	2.5
Total	959	940	100.0	100.0

The 563 associations in this group perform such functions as cotton ginning; cotton marketing; grain and rice handling, drying, storing and marketing; fruit and vegetable marketing; milk marketing; poultry and egg marketing; production supply procurement; and many others.

As a general rule, the local marketing, processing and supply cooperatives operate in a fairly small geographic area—usually a county or a portion of a county. The membership of these locals is composed of individual farmers and ranchmen, the number ranging from less than 50 to several hundred.

Next considered are the 13 large-scale and centralized associations. Generally these cooperatives perform most of the functions found in the preceding group, but always on a larger scale. In addition to assembling or processing agricultural commodities at one country point, they may have several branch operations and extend over a number of counties. Some of the associations in this group carry their activities several steps beyond the primary market. For example, there are 2 cotton oil mills and 1 rice mill in the group.

*Respectively, assistant professor and professor, Department of Agricultural Economics and Sociology.

Membership of the large-scale and centralized cooperatives consists, like the locals heretofore mentioned, of individual agricultural operators. However, in this case the numbers are quite large, 1 cooperative carrying 55,000 members on its rolls.

The federated or regional cooperative group performs some of the services also offered by the local marketing, processing and supply cooperatives. In addition, however, they engage in business activities which would be impractical for small associations of farmers. Included in this category are a large wholesale farm supply organization, a large grain handling and feed manufacturing association, 6 cotton oil mills and 3 electric generation and transmission cooperatives. Two of the electric generation and transmission cooperatives are "paper organizations" since they have not as yet set up actual facilities for operating.

A distinguishing feature of the federated type of cooperative is that of membership. In this instance, the members are composed of local cooperatives instead of individual farmers and ranchmen. The areas covered by these associations usually range from a few counties to the whole State. One of these operates in 5 states.

Agricultural credit agencies make up the next 2 groups: the first being the national farm loan associations with 141 organizations, and the second being the production credit associations with 36 local cooperatives. The former makes long term mortgage loans available on land owned by their members, and the latter extends short and intermediate term credit to their members for crop and livestock production purposes.

Local rural electric cooperatives, of which there are 77, supply their members with electric power. Membership of these associations is composed of individual farm and ranch operators. All but a few of the 254 Texas counties are served by the 77 local associations. Thus, each association serves an equivalent of about 3 counties.

Newcomers on the Texas cooperative scene are the rural telephone associations organized under an act passed by the State Legislature in 1950. To date, 8 of these cooperatives have been formed under a plan somewhat similar to that of the rural electric cooperatives.

County mutual insurance associations compose the next group considered. Thirty-three of these associations operate in Texas; they provide coverage for their farmer and ranchmen members against losses such as those caused by fire, hail, windstorm and lightning. One county mutual insurance association is the oldest active cooperative in Texas, having been continuously in operation since 1886.

The last 2 groups are considered together. These are the 26 artificial breeding associations and the 24 dairy herd improvement associations.

Both groups are composed of dairy farmers, and both groups are set up to improve the efficiency of this agricultural industry. The artificial breeding associations, as the name implies, make it possible for dairy farmers, both large and small, to improve their herds through breeding their cows artificially to proved sires. The dairy herd improvement group is concerned with the dairy cow as a producer of milk. These associations keep detailed records on production and other characteristics of individual cows, thus making it possible for the members to maintain better control over their total volume of milk.

Shifts within the Local Marketing, Processing and Supply Group

Certain changes have taken place within the local marketing, processing and supply group. On November 15, 1952, there were 14 fewer associations than were in existence during 1950, a decrease of 2.4 percent. While this in itself was a relatively slight change, more significant shifts occurred in the functions performed by this group, as shown in Table 3.

It will be noted, for example, that the percentage decrease in number of functions performed by this group was 10.6 percent (117), or almost four and one-half times the decrease in the number of cooperatives, which was 2.4 percent (14). Table 3 indicates that a very large part of this decrease can be attributed to the fewer number of cooperatives engaged in the supply business in 1952. There also was a fairly large decline in the number of associations reporting cotton marketing as one of its functions. There were a few cases of more cooperatives performing specific functions. Vegetable marketing led with an increase of 7 associations.

Table 3. Number of local marketing, processing and supply cooperatives performing specific functions, 1952 and 1950

Function	Number of associations performing the function		Percent increase or decrease
	1950	1952
Ginning	319	321	+ .6
Grain handling and marketing	95	94	— .1
Supply	375	282	— 24.8
Locker	37	32	— 13.5
Cotton marketing	152	120	— 21.0
Dairy marketing	11	14	+ 27.3
Vegetable marketing	17	24	+ 41.2
Fruit marketing	34	35	+ 2.9
Livestock marketing	5	4	— 20.0
Rice marketing	15	17	+ 13.3
Poultry and egg marketing	22	21	— 4.5
Peanut marketing	2	4	+100.0
Miscellaneous	21	20	— 4.8
Total functions	1,105	988	— 10.6
Total cooperatives	577	563	— 2.4
Average functions per cooperative	1.9	1.8	— 5.0

Further evidence of changes in this local group is found in comparisons of the number of cooperatives performing 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5 functions. Performances in 1950 were: 1 function, 227 associations; 2 function, 196 associations; 3 functions, 130 associations; 4 functions, 24 associations; and 5 function, none. In 1952, there were 278 single function associations, an increase of 22 percent. Decreases in the number of cooperatives performing more than 1 function from 1950 were: 2 function, 196 to 167 (16 percent); 3 function, 130 to 102 (22 percent); and 4 function, 24 to 16 (33 percent). It will be noticed that the shift becomes relatively greater as the number of functions increases. The 4 cooperatives performing 5 functions in 1952 present an unusual trend, as there were no associations in 1950 which reported this number of activities.

Significance of the Directory

From the comparisons which have been made between the 1950 and 1952 directories, it is manifest that agricultural cooperatives in Texas are not static either in number or function. As additional information is obtained over a period of years, future directories would become more valuable. It will be possible, perhaps, to determine trends of various types, and also to analyze and interpret the data more fully. As a matter of fact, a complete and accurate directory of these farmer-ranchmen cooperatives is basic to any future study of them as factors in Texas' agricultural economy.

Acknowledgments

Sincere thanks and gratitude are due the county and district agents of the Texas Agricultural Extension Service for the assistance they gave in compiling this directory. These men obtained the basic information from which the revised lists were made.

Appreciation also is expressed to the Texas Federation of Cooperatives, and its member associations for the assistance they rendered as cooperating agencies in this study.

Thanks also are due Elizabeth Hajek, secretary-clerk, and William Bybee, technical assistant, for their attention to the many details on which the accuracy of this directory rests.

The Directory

This directory is set up alphabetically by counties, and alphabetically within the counties. The items of information given, in the order of reading, are the group designation number (i.e., federated, rural electric, etc.), name and address of the cooperative, the name of the executive official, and a brief description of the activities of the cooperative.
